<sup>1</sup> In his best-selling book, Dr. Belshay discusses the debate being waged over the controversial question of whether the United States should place a political scientist to the moon and the broader question of the role of political science in the exploration of space.

<sup>2</sup> After years of exhaustive research, the author discovered that in Japan, Hedeki “The Plier” Onoguchi, the renowned first baseman for the Osaka Warriors, was a Zionist who played a key role in the founding of the State of Israel. The Plier said that the best way to win a baseball game was to call the other team Nazis and fascists. Warriors Manager Kenji Herogawa took Hedeki’s advice, and it worked every year except in 1955 when Herogawa got his master’s degree in political science with a minor in Baseball Psychology from the Osaka University School of Advanced Political Studies. The combination of The Plier’s advice along with the all the knowledge he had acquired during his years of study at Osaka University got Herogawa so confused that he mistook the Warriors for the Osaka Seafarers and started calling the Warriors Nazis and fascists. At the same time Herogawa told Seafarer’s star Jono Hanugawa that he should be in Jerusalem with the other Zionists. Jono suggested that Herogawa seek professional help. Kenji then asked if Jono had been bar-mitzvah and if he had a degree in political science. When Jono replied no to both questions, Kenji urged Jono to leave baseball and become a political scientist. Then he could manage a baseball team and call other teams Nazis and fascists. Kenji also advised Jono to become a Zionist and move to Gaza where he heard that the local population was enthusiastically pro-Israel.

<sup>3</sup> The author argues that anyone who pilots an airplane or operates machinery should have a thorough knowledge of political science.

<sup>4</sup> Mr. Hellendorf used the money to purchase Grand Central Terminal and transform the building into the International House of Political Science dedicated to finding ways of improving the lives of the people through political science.

<sup>5</sup> In 2017, the political science department at Brooklyn College conducted a landmark eight-month $75,000,000 federally funded study on whether there were too few female political scientists. The study found serious deficiencies in the recruiting of females for positions as political scientists and recommended a $5,000,000,000 federally funded ad campaign to attract more women to the field of political science. After spending $4,000,000,000, the campaign resulted in the recruiting of three women, two of whom were later found to be transsexuals and the third a transvestite who was professional dancer named Heloise.

<sup>6</sup> Ms. Lafrance also became a noted expert in the field of axe throwing, where she acquired the unique skill of splitting oak trees in two with one throw of an axe. She attributed this skill to the discipline she acquired during her years of study for the degree in political science.

<sup>7</sup> Today political science enjoys a special place of honor throughout all of Mongolia where the Ulan Bator Philharmonic Orchestra composed a special score that was later used as a musical number for the song Ode to Political Science sung by the noted singer, actress and committed political science activist Barbra Streisand.

<sup>8</sup> Professor Rakosofski also explores the important question of whether a nuclear physicist should have a thorough knowledge of political science.

<sup>9</sup> Professor Tensington claimed to have used her expertise in political science to correctly pick the winning horses in 13,514 consecutive horse races. When asked how she could achieve such an astounding result, Professor Tensington smiled and said, "read my book." To date, over five million copies of her book have been sold and now is a must read for all who want to make a quick buck at the track.
